Background

InGeNA is Australia's independent, industry-funded peak body for genomics and precision medicine. We bring together expertise across diagnostics, therapeutics, genomic technologies, software, data and services, from global companies to Australian innovators.

We work with government, consumers, healthcare providers, researchers and the wider genomics sector to help embed genomics and precision medicine into Australia's health system.

Why this is a critical time for Australia

Australia is investing $200 million in the Precision Health Research Program. The programme is in its planning phase and is intended to support research, innovation and clinical trials, strengthening the national genomics and precision medicine agenda.

Our advocacy in action

InGeNA has had a highly impactful year, including Professor Dame Sue Hill's Australian visit, which brought international genomics implementation experience into Australian discussions.

High engagement with members and the wider sector has brought around 800 participants into policy discussions, with 1,500 attendees across all events and activities. This highly active and engaged community connects industry expertise with shared priorities for genomics and precision medicine.

About associate membership

Associate membership offers a flexible approach for organisations that prefer targeted engagement with InGeNA. Scope and contributions are agreed for one or more initiatives, according to your organisation's interests and expertise.

Associate membership can also suit organisations unable to join as voting members because of internal requirements. This may include international organisations or research institutions.

Ways to contribute

Associate members can engage in an area of InGeNA's work or contribute to a particular project or initiative. The scope of involvement is agreed with each organisation, reflecting its interests, expertise and preferred contribution.

Contributions may include specialist skills and expertise, staff time, venues, equipment or financial support. Examples of targeted involvement include thought leadership series, breakfast panel sessions, webinars and roundtables.

InGeNA's strengths

InGeNA is a strong membership organisation that brings industry together through a united voice and coordinated advocacy. Our activities connect expertise and shared priorities across the genomics and precision medicine sector.

- Coordinated advocacy: we bring industry expertise into policy and implementation discussions on testing, assessment, funding and infrastructure.
- Intelligence and shared learning: we share policy updates, implementation insights and experience through member communications and briefings.
- Connections and convening: we bring industry, government, clinicians, consumers and researchers together through meetings, networking events and discussion.
- Member profile: we share member achievements and expertise through communications and events.

Associate participation in relevant initiatives, briefings, events or projects can be agreed as part of an associate package. The agreed scope determines the activities and information available to your organisation.

Associate membership fees

Fees and contributions are determined in agreement with an InGeNA representative. Contributions may be financial or in-kind, according to the scope agreed.

Any sponsorship and related recognition are agreed separately for the relevant initiative.

Governance

Associate membership does not confer AGM voting rights or eligibility to stand for an elected Board role. The Board may invite associates to attend general meetings; associates may not speak or vote at those meetings.

See the InGeNA Constitution for the formal provisions on Associates.

Next steps

Contact InGeNA to discuss your interests and contribution, agree the scope of the associate arrangement, and then complete the Associate Membership Application Form.
